CALIFORNIA DEPARTMENT OF CHILD SUPPORT SERVICES AND NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE TEAM UP TO HIGHLIGHT “RESPONSIBLE FATHERHOOD” CAMPAIGN

Oakland Raiders and San Francisco 49ers Players Will Serve as Fatherhood Role Models

SACRAMENTO—National Football League (NFL) stars from the Oakland Raiders and San Francisco 49ers are teaming up with the California Department of Child Support Services (DCSS) in its seventh annual “Responsible Fatherhood” campaign to encourage parents to take active roles in their children’s lives.

Oakland Raider Rod Woodson, and San Francisco 49ers Jeff Ulbrich and Bryant Young appear along with their children on specially designed football trading cards and posters that highlight the “Responsible Fatherhood” message.

“Woodson, Ulbrich and Bryant are accomplished athletes who provide positive role models for young fathers,” said DCSS Director Curt Child. “We’re excited to have these fathers and their teams’ commitment to help us increase the public’s awareness about just how important dads are in the lives of their children.”

The “Responsible Fatherhood” trading cards and posters will be distributed to fans at the San Francisco 49ers home game on Sunday, December 1, and the Oakland Raiders home game on Sunday, December 22. Woodson, Ulbrich and Bryant will each be honored with a commemorative plaque to recognize their participation in and support of the campaign. The materials will also be distributed to local child support agencies in all 58 counties, and they will be provided to California schools.

During the spring and summer, the “Responsible Fatherhood” campaign will focus on responsible fathers who play for California’s Major League Baseball teams. In the fall, fathers from the state’s NFL teams carry the campaign’s message.
